Social Media Training Resources Abound for Library Marketers

Social media is rapidly growing in use by organizations and companies looking to promote and get the word out about their mission or product. But, how necessary is social media for libraries? Social media is actually more important than you'd think for the Indiana State Library, as well as libraries across the state.

According to the recent study, Why Americans Use Social Media by Aaron Smith at the Pew Research Center, “Two-thirds of online adults (66%) use social media platforms such as Facebook, Twitter, MySpace, or LinkedIn,” in 2011. This number

State Library Welcomes New Evergreen Indiana Coordinator

Anna Goben was recently hired as the State Library's new Evergreen Indiana Coordinator in the Professional Development Office. She has extensive experience with the open source ILS platform having worked in one of the original Evergreen Indiana pilot libraries. Anna also has significant experience in reference librarianship and academic instruction.

Visit the PDO Staff page to contact Anna or any of the PDO's consulting and training specialists.

has likely increased since then and makes social media an invaluable tool for connecting with patrons.

Now more than ever, time is money and the way information is consumed is constantly maturing and evolving. Library staff are rolling with these changes and doing all that they can to use social media as a way to relay information to patrons in a fast and easily accessible way.

LibraryScienceList.com recently evaluated state libraries in the US and based a points system off of use of social media platforms like Facebook, Pinterest, Twitter, and LinkedIn. Factors such as number of followers as well as volume of content were analyzed and quantified in order to assign rankings. The Indiana State Library was ranked #10 in these rankings with Virginia, South Carolina, Texas, Connecticut, and Maine rounding out the top five.

The Indiana State Library is working hard to keep social media outlets current, accurate, and relevant to patrons needs.
